

Edward W. Clyde

7-18-91

In an arid, desert state like Utah, hard-to-find water supplies are the lifeblood of civilization. And few men deserve more credit for promoting water resources along the bustling Wasatch Front than Edward W. Clyde, who died this week at age 73.

The existence of the Central Utah Project, the five-state Upper Colorado River Compact on how to divide Colorado River water, and the creation of the Salt Lake County Water Conservancy District are, at least in part, the results of his expert work.

Clyde had a calm, reserved, soft-spoken demeanor, but it was merely the outer shell for an incisive, brilliant mind. When he talked about complex and difficult issues, he had a way of thrusting right to the heart of the matter.

That talent made him a prominent Salt Lake attorney, the founder of the law firm of Clyde, Pratt and Snow; a law professor at the University of Utah; the effective chairman of the U. Institutional Council for 12 years; and a national water authority honored by the U.S. Department of the Interior.

He served as general counsel to the Central Utah Water Conservancy District, which owns the CUP. He represented Utah in negotiations for the Upper Colorado River Compact, which divided the river waters among Utah, Wyoming, Colorado, Arizona and New Mexico. He was the first attorney for the Salt Lake County Water Conservancy District. And he argued CUP matters in Congress.

Among his many recognitions was being named Lawyer of the Year by the Utah State Bar in 1985. He had already often held that honor unofficially in the eyes of many of his peers. In addition, he was a devoted family man, a Sunday School teacher, and an indulgent grandfather and great-grandfather.

Utahns owe him a great debt for his expertise and tireless work. With the next drink of cool water on a hot summer day, let's pause to remember Edward W. Clyde as one of the men who devoted his professional life to making sure there would be enough of it delivered where it was needed.

He graduated from BYU in 1939 with a degree in Speech and Economics, and from the University of Utah College of Law in 1942, and was actively practicing law at the time of his death. He was a founder of the law firm of Clyde, Pratt & Snow in Salt Lake. He had a nationally prominent legal career, particularly in the field of natural resources and environmental law. He represented the State of Utah in the negotiations of the Upper Colorado River Compact, and was the attorney for the State Engineer for several years. He served on the Utah Land Board and Utah Board of Oil Gas & Mining, was Chairman of the Utah Constitutional Revision Commission, and was a special consultant to the National Water Commission and National Advisory Council on Public Lands. He published extensively in legal journals on natural resource law and policy issues. He served as attorney for Salt Lake County Water Conservancy District and the Central Utah Water Conservancy District. In addition to his legal career, he had a life-long association with the University of Utah, serving first as a faculty member in the College of Law, and later on with the governing board of the University from 1964 through 1981. For twelve years, he was Chairman of the Institutional Council and oversaw much of the growth of the University. He was serving on the board of the University Hospital at the time of his death. He had been active in state politics all his life, and once served as Chairman of the State Democratic Convention. He received numerous awards from public and private organizations, including an honorary Doctor of Laws degree from the University of Utah in 1981; the "Lawyer of the Year" award from the Utah State Bar in 1985; and the "Citizen's Award" from the Department of Interior in 1988.

He was active in ranching for many years, and found great joy in the natural beauty of his ranch in Woodland and Utah generally. He spent many happy hours at the ranch with his family and friends. He was a loving husband, father, and grandfather, and was devoted to his family. He and his wife enjoyed many years of traveling together. He was an Elder in the LDS Church, and had taught adult Sunday School classes for several years.
